Moroccan Cuisine

Enjoy A Cooking Class

The secret of Moroccan gastronomic art lies in the skilful dosage of a mixture of spices.

Moroccan cuisine is characterized by its variety of dishes mainly from Berber cuisine, with Arab, Jewish and Andalusian influences.

Despite its common features with the cuisines of other North African countries, Moroccan cuisine has retained its originality and unique cultural specificities.

Known for its aromas, spices and the hospitality of its inhabitants, Morocco is increasingly coveted for its cuisine. An art closely linked to the history and customs of the country.

From international rankings to international rankings, Moroccan cuisine has become one of the attractions of the Kingdom. Many travelers around the world praise the variety of dishes, which come from many backgrounds and various influences.

Moroccan cuisine reflects the history of the country and the different populations who have settled there. The tagine comes from the Berbers; these brought dates, milk, cereals, bread, almonds, fruits and herbs. The Arabs brought spices, dried fruits, nuts and bitter-sweet combinations; the Moors introduced olives, its oil and citrus fruits while the Jews notably shared their preservation techniques such as those of candied lemons or pickles, not to mention the British who, in the eighteenth century, imported the famous tea and the colonists French who have left behind a culture of cafes, pastries and even wine making. But the two great imprints of Moroccan cuisine in fact remain the Arab and Andalusian influence.

Get the chance to experience our cooking class in Morocco, to share our traditions and culture. This opportunity is an enjoyable participation to discover the Moroccan cuisine and know the secrets of the best Moroccan recipes in an entertaining way.

Moorish Mosaic Workshop

Also called
Zellij-Tilework

© Five Travel

Moorish Mosaic, Moroccan Tilework or Zellij. Zellige or Zillij is a typically Moroccan Art Form, which has been gratefully preserved by Families of Moroccan master's form generations back to the 10th century, thanks to their love of work well done, nobility of materials selected, and full mastery of required know-how.

A whole series of stages must be accomplished before handing over the piece to its decorator.

The craftsman unifies the clay paste with his arms and feet, making it less stiff, then the pieces are split into blocks and hardened again under sun light and flattened with a bat. Then, parts of 10x10 cm are obtained and placed under sun light for as long as it took to fully dry, which corresponded to the first burnt stage.

Afterwards, these pieces are submersed into a coloring, containing a mixture of lead, sand and other oxides that promote the desired color. This mixture is applied together with water, which help the process of dying.

The pieces are then submitted to a firing process in an oven and they are placed in it according to an order: the ones with white surfaces on the bottom (exposed directly to heat) and on the top the green ones (which are more sensitive to the firing process).

An important step of the whole manufacturing process is, afterwards, when the artisan draws onto the pieces using drawn and cut molds of paper. In the end, all pieces are rearranged according to their shape and color.

The Zellige is used to cover and ornate walls floors as an important element of Arab-Andalusian architecture which has been able to adapt to contemporary styles of decoration while preserving an artisanal manufacturing method.

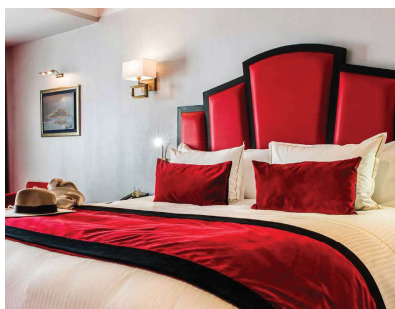

A workshop, led by masters in traditional Moorish Mosaic, called Zellige, to learn about fes pottery and assemble by yourself the intricate color pieces, for a worthy challenge and a joyful entertaining.
